Local, Fresh and In-Season Foods Raised Sustainably

South Central Ohio along with Northeastern Kentucky, like many other areas, has a long, rich history of agriculture and food production. In days gone by many people raised their own foods or bought from or traded with other locals to obtain fresh, locally produced foods.

Over the decades the number of people raising their own food has declined as well as the availability of locally sourced, nutritional foods. As a western society we have become more and more reliant on foods raised in other parts of the country and the world. This is not all bad as we now have access to a wider variety of foods as well as foods we cannot raise in our area and other foods we can when they are not in season here. These foods though lose taste and nutrition along the journey from their source to the local market. Locally raised and produced foods can provide us with fresher, more flavorful and nutritious foods.

For many, with our current food system we have also lost our connection with those that produce our food, as well as where and how it is raised. By establishing relationships with local food producers we can not only re-establish some of that connection, but also know more about the foods we are relying on for our sustenance and nutrition.

By supporting our local food producers and providers we are also helping to strengthen our local agricultural community and overall economy and preserving the rich local food producing heritage we are blessed with.

The purpose of this Local Foods Guide is to assist those interested in more readily finding sources of locally raised or sourced foods. We also hope that the local food demand will grow, thus encouraging more in our area to consider raising food products to be made available for local residents, whether that be produce, fruits, eggs, meats or whatever else there may be a demand for. We have also included a section for local artisans who produce works of art and other items of interest in our area.
